EARLY HISTORY OF DELRAY BEACH

Florida became the 27th state to join the Union in 1845. However, indigenous Native Americans have lived in the Delray Beach area for approximately 12,000 years before the time of first contact with European settlers of hunters, trappers and farmers. Runaway slaves fled to Florida in antebellum times and freed slaves entered Florida after the Civil War to begin new lives as farmers. An 1841 military map from the Second Seminole War shows a Seminole camp in the area of the swampy lake area now known as Lake Ida.

The first permanent structure in this area was the 1876 Orange Grove House of Refuge, one of five such houses of refuge constructed on Florida's southeast coast to shelter victims of shipwrecks. It was named for the wild, sour orange grove nearby and was located near the beach, about a quarter mile south of what's now Atlantic Avenue.

In 1871, land speculator William H. Hunt and Sara Gleason, wife of William H. Gleason, Lieutenant Governor of Florida, purchased a large quantity of land here. The frontier was a virtual a jungle of scrub pine, saw palmetto, oak saw grass and stunted sea grape, swarming with mosquitos, snakes and alligators. By 1895 the East Coast Canal (now the Intracoastal Waterway) had been made navigable to the House of Refuge, and when Henry Flagler's Florida East Coast Railway began laying track along the southeast Florida coast, speculators took note. Word spread quickly that this area was America's last frontier with an abundance of water and rich soil. Advertisements and land sale notices touting rich and fertile farmland available at inexpensive prices attracted people far and wide. Gleason and Hunt advertised the land for $25 an acre. William S. Linton, US Congressman from Saginaw, Michigan, and David Swinton purchased land from Gleason and Hunt, and Linton named the fledgling town for himself.

When Linton arrived here with his party, including a civil engineer, a railroad clerk, a railroad supply agent, and a few farmers, families of African descent were already settled west of the canal, now known as the Intracoastal Waterway. They were working as farmers and fishermen. In 1894, the first school in Linton was established by African American settlers. This area was then a part of Dade County until 1909 when Palm Beach County was established. That school, known as Dade County School #4 Colored, was located on Blackmer Street, now known as Northwest 5th Avenue.

The farmers who arrived with William Linton held high hopes for the sale of winter crops to be sent north on the Florida East Coast Railway, which came through Linton area in the spring of 1896, but the true pioneer experience of those first years was not easy. Many among the first group who purchased land from Linton opted to return from the “heat stricken and bug-infested land.” And when the devastating frost of the winter of 1896 killed their crops, many more left Florida, taking a loss on the land. William Linton defaulted on his land payments, and those who stayed had to pay for their land again.

In 1898, Linton became known as “Delray,” so named by W.W. Blackmer, a former railroad clerk. “Delray” was chosen because Blackmer, a Detroit native, liked the name of a section near his old city called Delray. The name had come from Mexico when a veteran of the Mexican War successfully petitioned the town of Belgrade, Michigan, to change its name to Del Rey (two words, later Anglicized to Delray) — which means of the king in Spanish.

Among the settlers who remained here through the early pioneer days were the Sterling family, who arrived in 1896 with their 5-year-old daughter Ethel, who went on to teach school, manage a hotel, and become one of the founders of the Delray Beach Historical Society later in 1964. And, Adolf Hofman, a German immigrant who exemplified the pioneer spirit of early South Florida.

Field Day, 1916

*A relay race is being held with runners passing American flags.
The race is in front of the first beach pavilion located at the end of Atlantic Avenue.
The occasion was probably on the Fourth of July.*

He cultivated pineapples, mangos and winter vegetables in the area that's now known as the Del-Ida Park Historic District, from the FEC railroad tracks west to Swinton Avenue, between NE 4th Street and George Bush Boulevard.

The main roads through town were Atlantic Avenue and Swinton Avenue. Homes and businesses aligned Atlantic Avenue and farms spread out around today's community center.

African American families also stayed when many others left, and gave the young community stability. In addition to the school, residents of the African American neighborhoods established two churches and a Masonic lodge before the end of the 19th century.

Farming and fishing were the major occupations in Delray during the early years of the 20th century. Japanese farmers from the nearby Yamato Colony visited Delray and participated in civic events.

The 1910 census shows a town of 904 citizens from twenty-five states and although small, Delray was a fully formed town interested in education and cultural pursuits. The Town of Delray incorporated in 1911 with John Shaw Sundy serving as the first mayor.

Mary Elizabeth Sterling, of the pioneering Sterling family, was the founder and leader of the “Ladies’ Improvement Association,” a group of conscientious pioneer women who took it upon themselves to help create an orderly community and attractive downtown. Most of these women were used to northern amenities so they took it upon themselves to assure that Delray was a respectable place to live and a welcoming destination for northern visitors. They were instrumental in the building of the first library, schools, rock roads, sidewalks, and even the first town hall. Mary also led a group of citizens to build the first beach pavilion in Delray, which helped draw visitors, a first step in transforming the community from strict reliance on its agricultural economy. A new school building at what is now the Delray Beach Center for the Arts at Old School Square was built in 1913. A separate high school building was completed in 1926, currently the Crest Theater.

The Florida real estate boom of the 1920s transformed Delray from a rustic pioneer town to a pretty resort town. It peaked in 1924 and Delray Beach grew to about 3,000 people. The Boom is still considered one of the greatest economic and social phenomena in American history. Hundreds of thousands of Americans poured into the Sunshine State and forever changed the global image of Florida. Construction, real estate speculation, and tourism helped develop Delray Beach into what was at the time the largest city between West Palm Beach and Fort Lauderdale.
